SECTION ACTIVITIES

4. The section primarily concentrates its efforts on the [redacted]. A continuous survey is maintained of the weapon acquisition programmes of other countries in the ME, particularly on those countries which are potentially hostile. New weapons are initially analysed as a single item and then scrutinized with a view to determining how they can be deployed as part of a system eg anti-tank missile fitted to a helicopter. The likely effect of the weapon system on tactics is also examined. This work forms a vital part of the long term planning activities of the IDF.

SOURCE MATERIAL

5. The majority (90%) of the source material becomes available from [redacted]. The remainder is obtained by [redacted]. Analysts are used to sort and file material. Unwanted information is returned to the Dissemination Centre for destruction.

PROGRAMME PLANNING

6. A research programme is normally planned on an annual basis. However, many intelligence requirements are of a short reaction ad hoc nature. The section then operates in a similar manner to a newspaper research office.

INFORMATION RETRIEVAL

7. The [REDACTED] Lt Col Benaya considers that present MIS Programmes available on the open market such as IBM's STAIRS - do not meet their requirements and at this stage a change is not envisaged.

PRESENTATION OF MATERIAL

8. Material is normally presented in as an abbreviated manner as possible. The origin and reliability of sources is always indicated on reports. However, raw source material is never passed on to the customer if it originates from a covert source.

PROFILE OF A TECHNICAL ANALYST

9. The qualities expected from an analyst are:
- Individualism - He must be capable lateral thinking and be self motivating.
 - High IQ.
 - Facility with languages - At least one additional language over and above English and Hebrew is required.
 - Appropriate military experience - Junior analysts
